ALLENTOWN, PA - Constitution Drive is a gravel road in a quiet part of Allentown that has a steep drop-off on one side, and train tracks on the other. It is said that a man was struck by a train one night while walking his dogs, severing his leg and leaving him to perish over the course of a few days on the deserted stretch of road. Since, passers-by have reported seeing paw prints and a single footprint in the snow, left by the ghost of the man and his dogs. Legend also claims that the surrounding woods sometimes emit a soft whistling sound, and that the area is populated by tiny pale-skinned people with red eyes.

WILLIAMSPORT, PA - Wildwood Cemetery has two sides-- a good side and a bad side. On a clear night, legend says that you can see fairies on the good side, while the bad side is populated by ghoulish creatures including a shrieking banshee and many individual tombs from which you can hear voices and banging sounds. There is a statue who cries and changes position by night that can be seen from the roadside. It is said that a retired fireman who was terrified of being buried alive designed a large mausoleum here for himself and his family that could be opened from the inside, but not the outside. At night, they are said to come out and play.

PITTSBURGH, PA - The House on Ridge Avenue, or the Congelier House, was for a long time considered to be the most haunted house in America. In fact, Thomas Edison once visited when he was experimenting with seance. What happened to inspire such ghost tales, you ask? The original owner of the house, Charles Congelier was discovered having an affair with the maid by his wife, who murdered the duplicitous couple. A few days later, a neighbor discovered Mrs. Congelier muttering at the maid's decapitated head, which she had cradled in her lap while she sat in her rocking chair. As if that incident wasn't enough, the next owner of the house was a reclusive doctor who, it was discovered, had a collection of women's heads in the basement that he was using for experimentation. After the crazy doctor, the house was converted into housing for immigrant workers who moved once they began mysteriously dying one by one. Eventually, the house exploded, leaving only a crater in its path-- locals insisted that it had been transported back to Hell, where it came from.
